At Paradigm's Edge: Trauma and the Human Condition III Anngwyn St. Just

By definition, social trauma work emphasizes the impact of overwhelming life events beyond individuals, and families on into the larger fields of local, national and global communities. Here we enter the realm of what may be understood as the often unseen and unacknowledged role, as well as trans-generational power, of the "Greater Forces" that shape individual experience, families and other social systems. These greater forces have many names and countless variations which often overlap; including war, racism, genocide, slavery, immigration, emigration, famine, religion, class warfare, political unrest, poverty, epidemics, radiation, natural disasters and the climate-change impacts to our entire biosphere. In essence, social trauma education and field work, as I see it, follow a basic rule of ecology which holds that everything, in one way or another, is connected to everything else.
