This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1845 edition. Excerpt: ...prevented, or at least influenced or changed, by mountains, or the vicinity of the sea, or by a broken and uneven surface. In all such places the regularity of the phenomena attending these changes is interrupted or mixed up with other phenomena, which arise from causes not connected with their regular process. It is true that along the western side of the Llanos the Andes rise to a great elevation, and at some places above the snow-line, but as these mountains extend in their general direction from south to north, or from south-west to north-east, they do not lie in the way of the principal currents of air, which depend upon the position of the sun and its march from the southern to the northern hemisphere, or in the opposite direction. It is, therefore, supposed that these mountains do not materially influence the changes of the season and the phenomena with which they are attended. The mountains of Venezuela, both the coast-range of the Andes and the Sierra del Bergantin, may certainly affect the free development of the aerial currents in their vicinity, but they are of too small extent and not elevated enough to have any material effect on a level plain which extends to nearly six hundred miles from their bases. As on these plains, therefore, the two seasons and their changes are less influenced by localities, Alexander von Humboldt has examined all the phenomena with great attention, and endeavoured to give an explanation of them. Nothing can be compared with the purity of the atmosphere from the month of December to that of February. The sky is always serene and cloudless; if a cloud appears, it is a phenomenon which attracts the attention of all the inhabitants. The wind blows from the east and east-northeast with force. As it..
